The most important literary event in the nineteenth century was the emergence of literary prose in all the modern Indian languages. It is not that prose was an invention of this period. Both Sanskrit and Persian had a vast body of prose. Persian prose in the main treated “serious and learned topics”; the purpose of the authors was “to inform and to uplift rather than to amuse”, despite the fact that the fantastic adventure of the Arabian Nights cycle gave scope to the creative imagination. Sanskrit which developed a simple and dignified prose-style from the time of the composition of the Upanisads, several centuries before Christ, employed prose in various spheres of intellectual and imaginative activities. Following the same tradition, Pali and a few Prakrit languages also developed a rich and vast body of tales and romances.

The regimented cantonment of Harappā may suggest the priest-controlled industries of Sumer. It may even be permissible to propose a priest-king for Mohenjodaro. But all these points, real or imagined, may be ascribed rather to the inherent cousinship of a social phase than to literal, local interchange. They are common generalities, the product of stray seeds readily fertilized in similar historical and geographical settings. The particularities, on the other hand, show abundant and significant local variation. In such sculptural art as the Indus has produced there is no real affinity with the sculpture of Sumer. No one would mistake a stone carving from Mohenjodaro for one from Tell Asmar or Mari. The Indus terracottas are in a different world from those of Mesopotamia. The art of the Harappan seals has no close parallel in the whole history of glyptic.

"Described as charity hospitals established by the heads of the Vaiśya families, Fa Hsien lists a cross section of poor and maimed people who were examined and given medicines for cure at these hospitals. The stay of the patients and provisioning for medicine was available in-house. In effect, the description seems to physically testify the existing form of the ideal type of an Ayurveda hospital that Charak had mentioned in his treatise. Seen in conjunction with Emperor Asoka's edicts informing us about planting of medical herbs which are suitable for men and animals and a number of passages from Sanskrit and Pāli literature talking about the merits of establishing 'Arogyashala' (halls for health) and medical institutions, Charaka's description of hospital does not seem to be historically untenable. They, in fact, lend a lot of credence to the Indic claim of being the place where institutional health care in South Asia evolved first."
